METAMORPHOSIS

OBJECTIVE:

This animation aims to explore the interplay between human experience and the environment through the use of representations of everyday objects that contain and transform elements of human nature to create a visual metaphor seeks to recognize how our emotions, actions and content are embedded in and affect our perceptions, actions and environment. By displaying everyday objects that transform and retain elements of the human form, I am trying to reflect on the interconnectedness between human experiences and the objects around us. Conversion can be defined as a metaphor for the human experience itself, revealing how our emotions, actions and essence are embedded in and affected by the surroundings.

BREIF NOTE:

This animation showing a series of transformations in which human bodies gradually adapt to various objects used on a daily basis, such as lamps, chairs, clocks, etc. Each transformed object contains human emotions and character traits Achievable are the seamless transitions between these changes including music that creates a cohesive and immersive experience for listeners.

For this Animation I've chosen four personalities and four surrounding things and tried to connect and morph with humans.

Lost in the Labyrinth:

I personally connected with spider web like a spider's web connecting various dots, my "mindscape" refers to the vast network of information I've been trained on. Each thread or link on this web represents links between different ideas, topics and pieces of information stored in my mind.

Spider webs have a certain structure and order to them. Similarly, a "mindscape" may suggest the organized and structured nature of information processing in the model.

My mindscape would be something that follows same pattern and that patterns could represent the vast network of information that I have been trained or collected on. My mind is organized and structured. It could reflect the systematic responses based on my understanding particular space and information. Though my mind is organized and follows particular routine my mind sometimes feels sort of illusion and my mind is so fragile that if it breaks it, my mind would be completely lost and broken it would struggle so hard to bring back on it's track.
